

IX. IDE Advanced School (IDEAS)

Chancellor: Takashi Shiraishi (President, IDE-JETRO)
Secretary- General: Masako Osuna

IDEAS was established as an education wing of the IDE. Since its inauguration in 1990, it has offered postgraduate-level programs in development studies in order to nurture experts who are able to deal with development issues that developing countries face today.

IDEAS offers two types of programs in parallel: a one-year program for Japanese students (September–July) and a six-month overseas fellows program for young government officials of Asian countries (October–March). During the first six months (October– March), many courses are offered jointly to the two groups in English, which allows close interactions between the Japanese and foreign learners. Through the programs, students are expected to develop a comprehensive understanding of national development policies, so that they will be able to propose solutions to existing development issues, and to acquire practical knowledge to implement specific projects.

The main feature of the curriculum is the introduction of structured cluster courses. In particular, the program provides four core courses including two intensive lectures in the first semester, in which both Japanese students and overseas fellows can learn together about the experiences of Japan and Asia in socioeconomic development as well as contemporary issues of development. Through this curriculum, students are expected to acquire a higher capacity to become experts in economic and social development for developing countries.

Japanese students who successfully complete the program can then proceed to a graduate school in development studies at an appropriate university abroad.

Training program for fellows from Asian Countries

(October 2008–March 2009)

The training program for overseas fellows was initiated in 1991. The objective is to increase the absorption capacity of foreign aid in developing countries. This objective can be achieved by training government officials who are in charge of planning and implementing socioeconomic development policies in the developing regions. The program provides opportunities to become acquainted with the aid administration policies of Japan and other developed countries as well as to study economic development in Japan and other Asian countries. In the current academic year, we invited 15 government officials and researchers from 14 Asian countries.

Follow-up Program

IDEAS conducts a short-term training program for the graduate IDEAS overseas fellows. This follow-up program aims to provide practical skills to cope with development issues which the overseas fellows are facing in their day-to-day work after completing the IDEAS program. The follow-up program started in 1995 and was carried out in Asian countries and Japan. The program for the 2008/09 academic year was held at Shanghai in China under the theme of “Sustainable Development in Asian Countries: A Case of Each Country” in November 2008.

Training Program for Japanese Students

(September 2008–July 2009)

This marked the nineteenth academic year that we trained 9 Japanese students selected from among 33 applicants.
